When a couple of miles out Homer suddenly rushel to the rail, sprang into the sea and started to swim ashore.

The colored people of the island are excellent swimmers, and he seemed to make good progress at first. The sea was rough and he was many times buried from view by the heavy waves.

The steamer continued on its course, and theman finally became a mere speck on the waters. As sharks abound there in large numbers Capt. Thempson is uncertain whether Homer reached shore or not.
